RURAL HUNGARY ON PLANE OF RURAL ENGLAND

This Interesting Country and People Described by G. Townley-Fullam. (Special to The Bulletin-)

Norwich

Washington, Dc. C. Nov. 24 .- In writing to the National Geographic Society of this city, C. TownleyTo Fullam says that rural Hungary is upon the plane of rural England.
"Physically she has a beauty all her own," he writes, and then continues:
"True, the noble magnificence of the English estate is not reproduced; but there is a general air of the feudal tradition, heightened by castle, tower and baitlement, which bring Norman England appreciably nearer. Abbies and monasteries, creations of pure architectural beauty there are not; but the Rocces, the Seccessio, and that splendid Moorish type which passes, strangely enough, for Gothic, fairly represent the achievements. The baronial splendors of the old homes of the magnates are first patriarchal and then wonderful."

"Rural Hungary is still the dream of other days, the quaint, still life which brooded in pre-Renaissance. ociety of this city, C. Townley-

"Rural Hungary is still the dream of other days, the quaint, still life which brooded in pre-Renaissance pictures and peeps out under the magic of Washington Irving's touch-restful, alluring, and casting the reflective grace of innocence upon its mighty sons. 'Sweet Anburns' that are passing in other climes nestle about every placid valley of this."

"Here is 'Arcadie, home of the happy' and here is 'the forest primeval'; here are 'vast meadows stretched to the eastward and pasture to flocks without number.'

When the land is snowbound swept by the keen, clear, cold air of the white north, and the long winter nights fall, great wood fires crackle of the bare hearthstones; children ar old folk turn to the spinning of sill old folk turn to the spinning of silk; the schools take their toll, and virile energies are given over to basket-weaving, reed-plaiting, and wood-carving, just as when Horatius kept the bridge by the yellow Tiber."

"A musical, wine-loving, hospitable race; warm, generous, and combative; proud and vain; blood-brother in temperament to the impulsive Celt; dowered like him with the curse of Reuben, with a total incapacity to unite on great issues and the power to fight on any soll but his own, but

Thanksgiving we'll be greeting
Ere many days go by,
And turkey we'll be eating.
And ake the punkin pie.
And though the atmosphere be freesin',
We'll joilify beyond all reason
And hall the happy autumn season.

Thus autumn days extelling,
I've praised within my rhymes
As off in verses rolling I've boosted other times.

"I'm sorry to be so late, my dean.
A friend asked me to stop and take not luck with him."
"Well did you win the pot?"—
Birmingham Age-Herald.

"Yes," replied the patriotic citizen;
"although I don't knew what is going to happen to me when my wife gets to picking out calleo necktles for me."
